The story is basically about a warrior named Satyavan who believed in God and was a devotee of Goddess Sati. Sati is a deity who is represented as half woman, half lioness. This is why he got the name of Satyavan. One day he went to the battlefield with his friend Vaikuntha. There he found Goddess Sati's son Yamaraj along with some demons. Upon realizing that the demons were killing people he cut off their heads to save his friends. As you may have guessed, Yamaraj (the son of Goddess Sati) was furious at Satyavan for killing people. So he asked him for an apology. "I made a mistake and I request you to forgive me", says Satyavan. "You do not ask forgiveness", says Yamaraj. "I do ask forgiveness", says Satyavan. "I order you not to ask for forgiveness", says Yamaraj. "I promise you to not ask for forgiveness", says Satyavan. "You do not promise to not ask for forgiveness", says Yamaraj. "I promise to not ask for forgiveness", says Satyavan. "You should have asked for forgiveness first then I would have forgiven you”, says Yamaraj. At this point you may be thinking why it is being discussed in such a lengthy manner? The answer is pretty simple. This is a conversation between two antagonists. Satyavan tried his best to convince Yamaraj to forgive him. When Yamaraj refused to forgive him it made Satyavan feel bad. If he had apologized and Yamaraj still refused to forgive him then there would have been no reason for Satyavan to feel bad. This is exactly what Yamaraj wants.

He wants to make Satyavan feel bad in order to prove to other people that he is superior. When Satyavan feels bad it is Yamaraj’s chance to say: “See, I am still superior even if I have to punish him to do so.” The conversation between these two antagonistic people is quite interesting and is told in the following dialog: You may also like: The Meaning of Life is God When you think of 82157476af
